– MAIN TOPIC

“Human security agenda in the globalized world”

For many people, today's world is an insecure place, full of threats on many fronts. Natural disasters, violent conflicts, chronic and persistent poverty, health pandemics, international terrorism, and sudden economic and financial downturns impose significant hardships and undercut prospects for sustainable development, peace and stability. Such crises are complex, entailing multiple forms of human insecurity. When insecurities overlap, they can grow exponentially, spilling into all aspects of people's lives, destroying entire communities and crossing national borders (UN.ORG)

The United Nations Development Program Report identified seven areas of threats to global security, ranging from health and food to economical and political security. This approach, adopted by the UN, is a way of understanding human security in a broad sense with an emphasis that all types of threats should get equal attention. At the same time, in human security literature these types of threats are commonly categorized as freedom from fear (protection of an individual from violence) and freedom from want (focus is beyond violence, on existential threats to a human's life) (UNDP, 1994). For people in crisis and extreme poverty, acting on single issues is not enough. Insecurities must be tackled together, comprehensively. Only then will people begin to feel safe in all aspects of their lives, have the income and opportunities to attain well-being, and know that their rights and dignity are fully respected. Only then will they enjoy human security – a more powerful, lasting approach to the most difficult deficits in peace and development.

Human security shapes and strengthens moral, ethical, and ideational foundations of politics and eventually accelerates multilateral, humanitarian efforts of the world community. Besides, the human security vision is considered to complement national and international security, but does not replace it.
